Report of Ed Zimmerman's presentation to LAC regarding instructional use of the computer-

CSI (Computer Supplemented Instruction) involves use of the computer as an instructional resource or tool- for example, to prepare graphs, produce test variations, or provide special drill sequences for students. According to Ed Zimmerman, Chairman of the Computer Programming Committee, CSI probably offers the most practical instructional application of the computer for Tacoma Community College at this time.

In a presentation to the Learning Assistance Committee on May 3, Mr. Zimmerman compared the more costly CAI (Computer Assisted Instruction) with a programmed text involving extensive direct student interaction with the computer. PLATO is an example of CAI.

In CMI (Computer Managed Instruction) the computer is not used for direct instruction, but is programmed to manage student progress through an instructional system involving a variety of techniques and resources. It requires extensive pre-planning and is only cost effective for large scale application. RSVP (Response System with Variable Prescription), on loan from Miami Dade, is an example of CMI.

Noting that TCC's instructional computer terminals are connected with programs at SWU and EWSC, Mr. Zimmerman passed around samples from WSU's Student Scheduled Repeatable Testing. This program provides for recall of selected questions, by category, from a pre-programmed bank of test questions. As a guide to students who miss questions, the print-out includes referrals from each question to an appropriate source of information.

After surveying the computer as an instructional resource, Mr. Zimmerman briefly demonstrated console interaction on two locally developed student drill programs, one in Spanish vocabulary and one on hospital and medical records.
